Ved Skagens Strand.

Kunstnerkoloni, der Aar efter Aar har slaaet sig ned ved Danmarks nordligste Punkt. En Række Billeder skildrer Fiskernes daglige Liv. Man ser de uforfærdede Havets Helte i Olietrøje og Sydvest sætte Baadene i Vandet. Maaske gælder Farten flere Dages og Nætters Ophold paa Havet. Ingen af dem kan vide, hvilke Faren, der lurer paa dem, naar først de er ude paa Havet. De maa sætte deres Lid til Heldet - og til Redningsvæsnet, der vel ingen Steder i hele Verden er saa vel organiseret som her ved Skagens Strand, hvor den farefulde Gerning bestandig gaar i Arv fra Fader til Søn.

Af Kunstnernavne, der i den almindelige Bevidsthed er uløseligt knyttede til Skagen, kan der nævnes Michael Ancher, Anna Ancher, E. Tuxen, P.S.Krøyer, Peter Nansen og Carl Locher, men fremfor allo Digterkæmpen Holger Drachmann, der oppe mellem de hvide Klitter havde sit fantastisk udstyrede lille Hus. Hvad var vel efter hans Død naturligere end at rejse Mindet for ham paa et Punkt ved Skagens Strand, hvorfra Digteren i levende Live ofte har skuet ud over det mægtige Hav.

Master Criminal versus Detective.

A Battle of Wits and a Terrible End.

CASI

WILL SEDDON, man of genius and master criminal.
ALMA WINNING, his sweetheart, who stands by him until the end.
JACK EVANS, cousin to Alma and Will.
M. HERTZ, a famous Russian detective.

In the home of Will Seddon, where Alma, his cousin, kept the household for he and Jack Evans, trouble was in store for all. Will had got to love Alma, who had been with the family since a child, while Jack, the younger man, was also obviously attached to her. Jack, at last, passionately declared his love, but she, in a and Jack saw Will off by the mail train. Alma was destined to see no more of her lover for a long period.

Things did not prosper with Will Seddon and he was at last induced to throw in his lot with an international gang of jewel thieves. In order to allay Alma's anxiety he sent her a letter announcing his appointment to a kindly way, told him of her love for Will and a previous promise.

After her refusal of Jack's offer of marriage she was greatly distressed to hear of Will desiring to go abroad. He again declared his love for her and she once more swore to be faithful unto the end. A few days later she new position of trust. For many months she heard no more until, one day, a letter arrived saying that he would arrive in the town shortly. The messenger also handed her a hand-bag. Will, in his letter, asked her to keep the bag in safety until his arrival.

Before leaving for the hotel, where he was to stay,

Alma's curiosity overcame her, and she opened the handbag to discover, to her dismay, a large quantity of valuable jewellery. Safely hiding the bag, she set out for the station, accompanied by Jack. On the way she procured a paper, and, while waiting, her eyes fell upon the report of a big robbery in St. Petersburg. The description of part of the missing property tallied with the contents of the handbag. She knew now, to her sorrow, the reason for Will's long silence.

The paragraph read—

"A great jewel robbery occurred at St. Petersburg. The missing property included......and booty to the value of £25,000 was stolen. A gang of clever international thieves are suspected of the crime."

Alma had her suspicions confirmed by finding Will absorbed in the reading of the same "par.," and

He had, however, more than his match in Seddon, for the latter told Alma to pretend to faint at a given signal. She did so, and in the commotion Seddon secured the detective's passports. Hertz was then invited to join them, and told by Will that Jack was his man. They all adjourned to the hotel for supper, and champagne was ordered by Will.

Hertz soon made an excuse to leave for a few minutes, and Will following, heard his 'phone message for the local police to render assistance. Quickly returning, Seddon invited an adjoining party to join their table, and Hertz returned to find himself one of a crowd. Seddon had meanwhile told Alma to switch off the lights as soon as he raised his glass.

Seddon was conscious now of the detective being upon his track. At the signal Alma put out the lights and in succeeded in extracting a confession of his compactly from him. She promised to stand by him and to help him, for she still, thief or honest man, loved him as dearly as ever. While Alma, Jack, and Will were talking, a keen looking stranger looked in at the door of the restaurant and sat down at a table near by.

Will asked Alma to procure him a ticket for Hamburg, and she left as the man entered the place. On her return a little party to celebrate the re-union of the three cousins was arranged, and they went to a popular cabaret. Here they were again followed by the Russian, of a military bearing. Will Seddon overheard his order to the waiter and instantly divined his presence. It was Hertz, the greatest of the Russian detective force!

a trice another lady was complaining of the loss of her valuable necklace. Just as order was restored the police entered, and Seddon at once gave Hertz in charge, accusing him of the theft and, producing the stolen passports from his own pockets, said, "I am Hertz, of St. Petersburg. This is one of the great international jewel gang."

He, furthermore, in support of his statement, produced from Hertz' pockets the stolen jewels and some papers of an incriminating nature. The detective was led away, angrily vowing vengeance upon the wily Seddon. The strain of the last few days had been too much for Will and he and his cousins adjourned to their old home.

By a curious chain of events, a witness appeared at the police office and produced a letter which clearly exonerated Hertz. The police now saw their mistake, and all haste was made towards the house where Alma was known to reside. Jack had also got to know of their movements and now saw through the events which his wine fogged brain had hitherto prevented his recognition of.

At all costs Will must be saved, and it was now a race between Jack and the detective. Jack arrived at the house just in time to forestall Hertz, and told Will to prepare to fly for his life. Too late, footsteps were already upon the stairs. Concealment was now the only course, and Will was sent into the other room while Alma and Jack sought to gain time. A loud knocking and then an angry voice, "In the Emperor's name I command you to open this door!"

A few tense moments and the waiting men began to break down the door. They finally entered, and with brutal threats strove to elicit from Alma the hiding place of Will. The fugitive was now in a place upon the roof, where he could not be seen from below. A brief and hurried search and the baffled detectives decided to await his return to the house. An angry scene followed between the irate Hertz and Alma.

The brutal nature of the Russian was displayed in a callous cross-examination of the young girl. At last Will could no longer withstand the sound of it, and he came again perilously along the ledges to the window. In a trice the Russian had him covered, but ere the weapon could speak, Seddon cried out, "You shall never take me alive," and his life was dashed out upon the pavement some fifty feet below. Hertz was outwitted, and descended to find his prisoner lying in the throes of an agonising death.

THE SKAW.

Extremely quaint and interesting pictures of the most northerly part of Jutland.

This forms a very taking scenic subject. The sea always will appeal in pictures, and here we have it and the lives of the fisher folk embodied in a scenic picture which, in one or two parts, closely approaches the sensational.

Fisher life, and its quaint "side-lights," form the first part of the film, then we witness a fire at sea, in which a big vessel is seen in a veritable inferno of flames.

Released July 7th.

Code Word, "Skaw."

We are then introduced to the budding "hardy Norsemen," then we see the famous lighthouse of the Skaw. A wonderful effect follows, the overlapping waves of the two tides of the North Sea and the Kattegat. This is a marvellous spectacle.

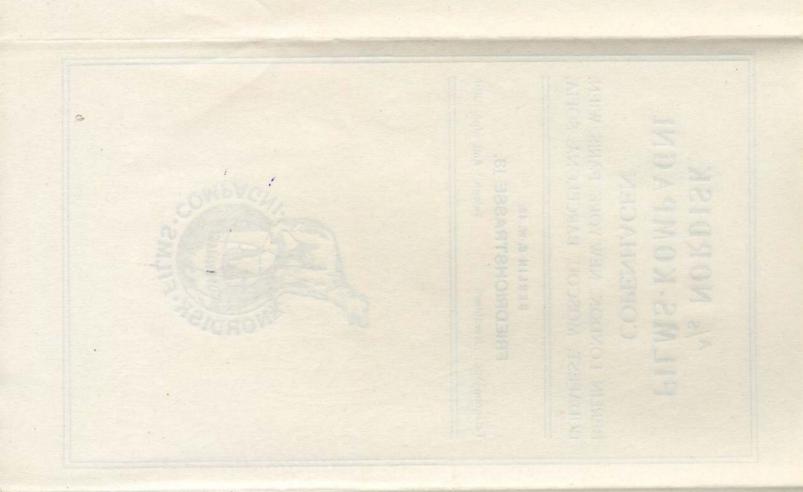

A rough sea and flying foam conclude a fine picture which we have only "outlined" in an all too brief and cursory manner.
